Choosing the Best Physical Therapist (Yes, Your Choice!)

Choosing a physical therapist is a personal decision and one that shouldn't be made in haste or be pressured by a physician. One of the best ways to locate a therapist is by asking family, friends, co-workers or primary care physician for recommendations. An online search can also be conducted.

While all physical therapists are highly trained and educated professionals, some choose to specialize in specific areas of expertise. Some physical therapists specialize in all aspects of pregnancy related needs, while others choose to concentrate on sports injuries, rehabilitation for stroke or accident victims, pediatrics, neurology or geriatrics. It's important that patients select a physical therapist that has experience in their particular condition.

Try to schedule a consultation with the physical therapist(s) that are being considered. Patients should feel comfortable with their physical therapist, be able to ask questions and talk with them freely about their condition and treatment. Having a rapport with the physical therapist is critical for effective treatment.

A physical therapist may choose to operate their practice where they devote their entire time to one patient at a time. Others work with two to three patients at the same time within the same time frame. If a physical therapist is not spending one on one time with you or leaves you on a machine for an extended period of time, you may want to reconsider going to that clinic. Another important consideration is if the patient will see the same therapist for each appointment.
